President's Message

By Pamela Baird
MVHA President

Above: This c. 1950 shows Lane's Creamery and the University Creamery near the entrance of the Mtn. View Theatre at 228 Castro Street.

Who doesn't like Ice Cream? Some of my favorite childhood memories includes ice cream. My family purchased an electric ice cream maker (much easier than a hand crank which took forever and was a lot of work), which we would set up on the back patio for a summertime treat. Usually we made vanilla, but when peaches were ripe my mother would add those to the mix. Yummy! My maternal grandfather, who lived in a small town in southwest Iowa, enjoyed taking me to the Dairy Queen when we visited in the summer. He always ordered vanilla and I selected chocolate. There was nothing better than soft serve ice cream on a hot night.

Ice cream has been an American favorite dessert for centuries. The concoction likely arrived with European settlers in the early 1700s. Both Thomas Jefferson and George Washington were big fans of ice cream. But ice cream was a rare and exotic dessert because of the difficulty in finding supplies of the ice necessary for production, especially in summer.

When industrialization and better technology increased, the production of ice cream became much easier. Mechanical refrigeration, the homogenizer, electric power and motors, packing machines, and new freezing processes and equipment allowed a consistent supply of ice cream. In addition, motorized delivery vehicles dramatically changed the industry, making the product available in small towns and cities across America.

A staggering 9% of American cow's milk production is dedicated to ice cream. In 2019, the USDA stated that U.S. residents consumed around 21 pounds of frozen dairy products per capita, about four pounds per capita less than in 2000. According to the USDA, the standards for ice cream consist of 20% cream and 10% milk. Also, ice cream will usually contain at least 10% fat (although some of the luxurious brands will contain 15-20%). Soft serve ice cream contains the exact same ingredients as regular ice cream, but comes from a machine that results in a smoother texture. The machine incorporates more air and doesn't allow the ice cream to harden as much.

Ice cream has been popular in Mountain View for many decades. Castro Street has featured at least one family owned ice cream store (or creamery as they were commonly called). Board member Gill Lane recalls the creamery that his family owned at 242 Castro Street. Prior to the Lane family ownership, it was the Silver Seal Creamery, which opened in 1933. The Lane Creamery was located on one side of the Mountain View Movie Theater (and for a time University Creamery was located on the other side!). The family made ice cream for sale in pints, quarts and gallons in their store and at local grocery stores as well.

Another favorite ice cream store was Double Rainbow Ice Cream, which was located at 135 Castro Street. Roger and Denise Siu opened the ice cream store in 1988. The store remained in operation until 2003. Today there are four stores on Castro Street selling frozen desserts.

In 1984, President Ronald Reagan designated July as National Ice Cream Month and the third Sunday of the month as National Ice Cream Day. Although our August event will not be held in the National Ice Cream Month, we invite you to join us August 7 at the Adobe House for history and ice cream—a great combination for a Sunday afternoon!

Board Member Honored

By Pamela Baird
MVHA President

The newly formed Santa Clara County Preservation Alliance hosted an evening of recognition May 21 at San Jose History Park. Awards were given to 16 different individuals from various historical associations in a first ever award presentation.

Mary Kay "Marina" Marinovich, a long-time board member and history activist, was selected by the MVHA for her work in saving the Immigrant House. The award notes the following:

The Mtn. View Historical Association is proud to recognize our board member Mary Kay Marinovich for her tireless work and leadership to preserve Immigrant House. It is a true monument to past and future Mtn. View immigrants, as well as our agricultural history. Built in the 1880s and now the centerpiece in our City's Heritage Park, Immigrant House serves as a reminder to our community of our core value of welcoming people of all backgrounds and cultures to Mtn. View.

Ms. Marinovich advocated and raised funds through her organization Friends of Immigrant House. This modest former farm-laborer cottage, where her Croatian ancestors once lived, was preserved and moved to its current location. The support of the Mtn. View City Council, Mtn. View Kiwanis, City of Mtn. View Firefighters, Google and the Old Mtn. View Neighborhood Association aided in the success of the project. The city of Mtn. View is fortunate to have a dedicated member of the community like Mary Kay.

Asked about her thoughts regarding the evening, Marina replied "It was a fun event, with lots of political luminaries present. Robert Cox (vice President of MVHA), and a longtime supporter of Immigrant House, gave a wonderful introductory speech. MVHA treasurer Emily Ramos handed the award to me. Mountain View Mayor Lucas Ramirez was there to show his support as well as Carol Lewis from the Kiwanis Club of Mountain View. David Lewis, president of the Old Mountain View Neighborhood Association took photos. I felt very well supported!"

MVHA appreciated the opportunity to recognize an important local community member and dedicated volunteer.

Finding Your Family History

By Robert Cox
MVHA Vice President

The 1950 USA census has just been released! A census release is a major genealogical event which occurs once every decade. There is a 72 year hold on census data to protect the privacy of most living individuals.

For those of us who have at least one family line that reaches back in the USA before 1900, the census is the best first place to look for data. Before 1900, most states did not register births and deaths. But there has been a USA census every decade since 1790.

This is particularly useful for tracing your family during the time between the Revolutionary War and the Civil War. During this time, many Americans left the original 13 colonies to move west. Local records are particularly sparse during this time. It was also common for courthouses, where the records were kept, to burn down. When this happened, all chief legal documents, like wills, property, and court records were lost.

The information in each census varies from decade to decade. Early censuses listed only the head of household by name. Starting with 1850, each free person is listed by name and each enslaved person by age. Starting with 1880, the family relationship of each person to the head of household is listed. Most censuses include the state or country where a person was born, and occasionally where their parents were born. The person's race, occupation, property value, and disability status are also often included. For 1900, the month of birth and number of years married is also included. The 1880 census, unfortunately, was in a warehouse that was burned and no longer exists. There was a census of Civil War veterans in 1890 that can sometimes fill in the information gap. Some states also held censuses, usually in years ending in 5.

You can access census records for free on the Family Search website: www.familysearch.org. Select "Search Historical Records" and type in the name of the person you are interested in.

Next time, I will talk about what additional information you can get by using paid services.

Hanger One Restoration to Resume

By Pamela Baird
MVHA President

After sitting without a covering for over a decade, the restoration of Hangar One at Moffett Field will be undertaken. The epoxy coating previously installed over the steel frame meant to keep contaminants from further "migrating" has deteriorated in several areas. Crews will have to methodically clean about 1.8 million square feet of steel elements to remove the lead paint and PCBs under the epoxy coating.

This process will take about two years. Scaffolding has been installed on the north end of the building, from which workers will start the complicated work. Once the cleaning and recoating of the steel framing is completed the restoration of the exterior skin can occur.

On May 6, a celebration of this phase of Hangar One restoration was attended by supporters and local officials. Congresswoman Anna Eshoo, who led efforts to save it, issued the following statement, "Having worked on this issue since 2003, I'm thrilled that restoration of Hangar One will finally begin on May 5. Our community has worked for years to save this historic landmark that defines the landscape of the South Bay region and Silicon Valley".

Hangar One was built in 1933 as part of Admiral William A. Moffett's vision for Naval Aviation. The hangar was to serve as home to the dirigible USS Macon. The huge building is shaped like an elongated dome. Its dimensions are 198 feet tall, 308 feet wide, 1,133 feet long, and its interior covers eight acres.

In 1994 NASA took control of the site from the Navy. In 2003, toxins from the hangar's exterior panels were discovered to be migrating into the ground and ground water. The Navy was determined to be the agency responsible for the mitigation of the pollutants.

In 2005 the Navy announced that it wanted to demolish Hanger One, based on the extensive pollution created from the deteriorating coatings on the steel frame and the panels used to construct the sides. The public outcry was swift.

Former mayor Lenny Siegel, with his knowledge as a member of the Moffett Field Restoration Advisory Board (RAB), founded the Save Hangar One Committee, an organization made up of RAB members, Navy veterans, and preservationists. They quickly mounted an effort to protect the iconic building.

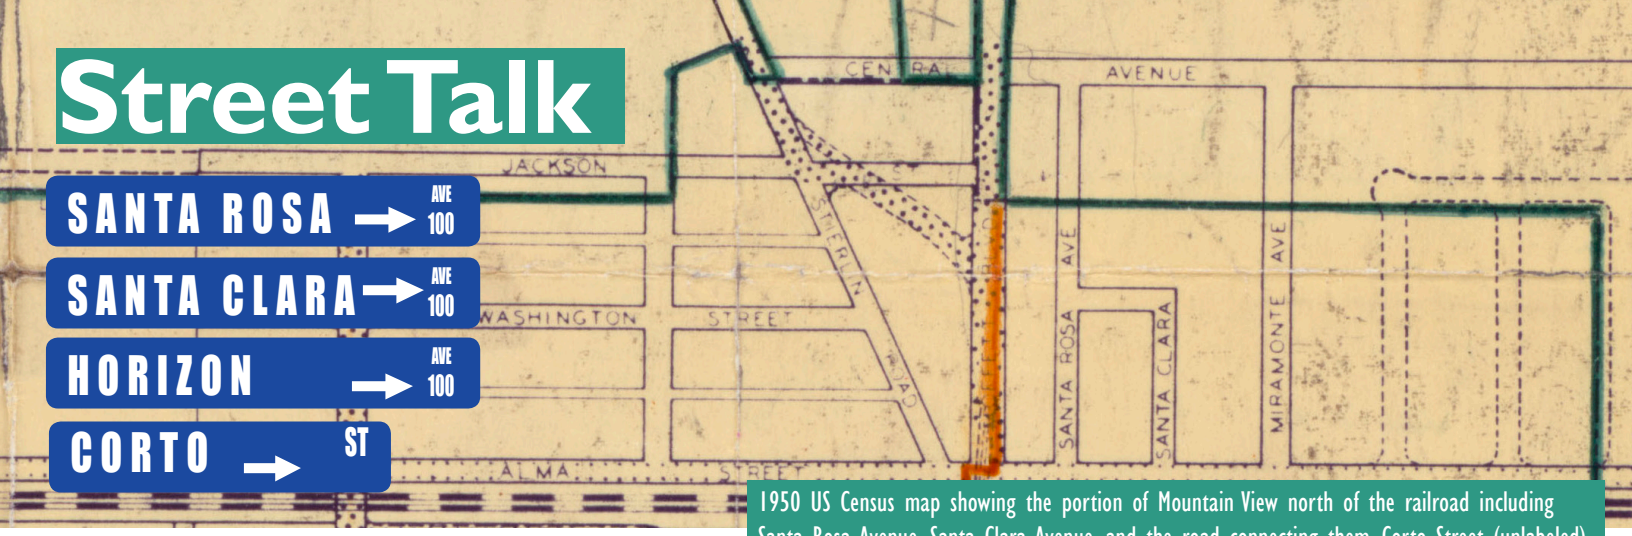

The US Navy removed these panels in 2011 and cleaned up toxic materials, leaving NASA in charge of reskinning. In 2014, Google started a 60 year lease for the 1,000 acre Moffett Field Site for $1.6 billion, which included repurposing the three existing airship hangers into laboratories. As part of that deal, Google officials pledged to eventually restore Hangar One by cleaning its structure and reskinning it with new siding.

Hangar One is expected to help Google's Planetary Ventures unit study robots, rovers, drones, balloons, and other technology.

Greg Unangst, a Mountain View resident and co-chairman of the Restoration Advisory Board monitoring the efforts, commented, "if Planetary Ventures can successfully complete their plans, the hangar should look very much like it looked in the 1930s, only better, without the asbestos, lead and PCBs."

Driving by Hangar One on 101 over the next two years will provide an ongoing display of the complexity of restoring one of the world's largest freestanding structures and one of the most recognizable landmarks of Silicon Valley.

Street Talk

1950 US Census map showing the portion of Mountain View north of the railroad including Santa Rosa Avenue, Santa Clara Avenue, and the road connecting them, Corto Street (unlabeled)

By Nick Perry & Candace Bowers
MVHA Past President, MVHA Historical Data Chair

After an over two-year hiatus due to the pandemic, our summer event marks the MVHA's long-awaited return "home" to our traditional meeting/event location, the historic Adobe Building on Moffett Boulevard. In honor of this happy occasion, we thought it'd be fun to focus this newsletter's Street Talk column on the names of the streets in the small neighborhood just behind the Adobe Building.

This small residential neighborhood was once known as "Estrada Park." Further research is needed, but the name's origins likely are linked to Francisco Estrada, original owner of the Mexican-era rancho that is now occupied by present-day Mountain View and Sunnyvale (Estrada's father-in-law, Mariano Castro, inherited the rancho after his son-in-law's death in 1845). Early 1900s newspaper clippings regarding "Estrada Park" in the MVHA archives describe a number of plans to subdivide the area as an expansion of the town of Mountain View, with proposed street names like Adams Avenue (perhaps a nod to the second US President to compliment the nearby Washington Street), Alvarado Street, Estrada Boulevard, and Estrada Place. These streets, as far as our current research shows, never came into being. Instead we see the present-day streets start to appear on maps of Mountain View, starting in the early 1940s. Here's what we know about each of them:

Santa Rosa Avenue: Saint Rose of Lima ("Santa Rosa") was born in 1586 as Isabel Flores de Oliva, in Lima Peru and died in 1617. She was canonized as a Catholic saint in 1671. She is the namesake of the City of Santa Rosa, the County Seat of Sonoma County, founded in 1833.

Santa Clara Avenue: Santa Clara de Assisi ("Saint Claire") was born in 1194 as Chiara Offreduccio in Assisi, Italy and died in 1253. She was canonized as a Catholic saint in 1255. Mission Santa Clara (founded in 1777), the Santa Clara Valley, the City of Santa Clara, and Santa Clara County are all named in her honor.

Corto Street: "Corto" means "short" in Spanish, and is a fitting name for the block-long street that connects Santa Clara and Santa Rosa avenues. Only ~200 feet long, it was probably one of Mountain View's shortest streets until more tightly-packed subdivisions were built in recent decades.

Horizon Avenue: Maps as early as the 1920s show this street as Miramonte Avenue. In the 1940s, the Fire Department led efforts to rename the street to avoid confusion when serving emergency calls from the still extant Miramonte Avenue south of El Camino Real. Maps in the 1950-60s show the street renamed as "North View Street," an extension of View Street to the south. Some time between 1965 and 1969 it was renamed again to "Horizon Avenue." Why? Likely due to the fact that the railroad (and later Central Expressway and Evelyn Avenue) always made it impossible to connect the two segments of View Street. As for why the name "Horizon," we're not certain. Perhaps the answer lies deeper in our archives our among one of the readers of this column. Reach out to us if you have more info!

This 1939 aerial photo shows Santa Rosa Avenue when it was an unpaved back alley to Moffett Boulevard. The Adobe Building and adjacent circle-shaped City reservoir are visible at the intersection of Moffett Boulevard and Alma Street (now Central Expressway).

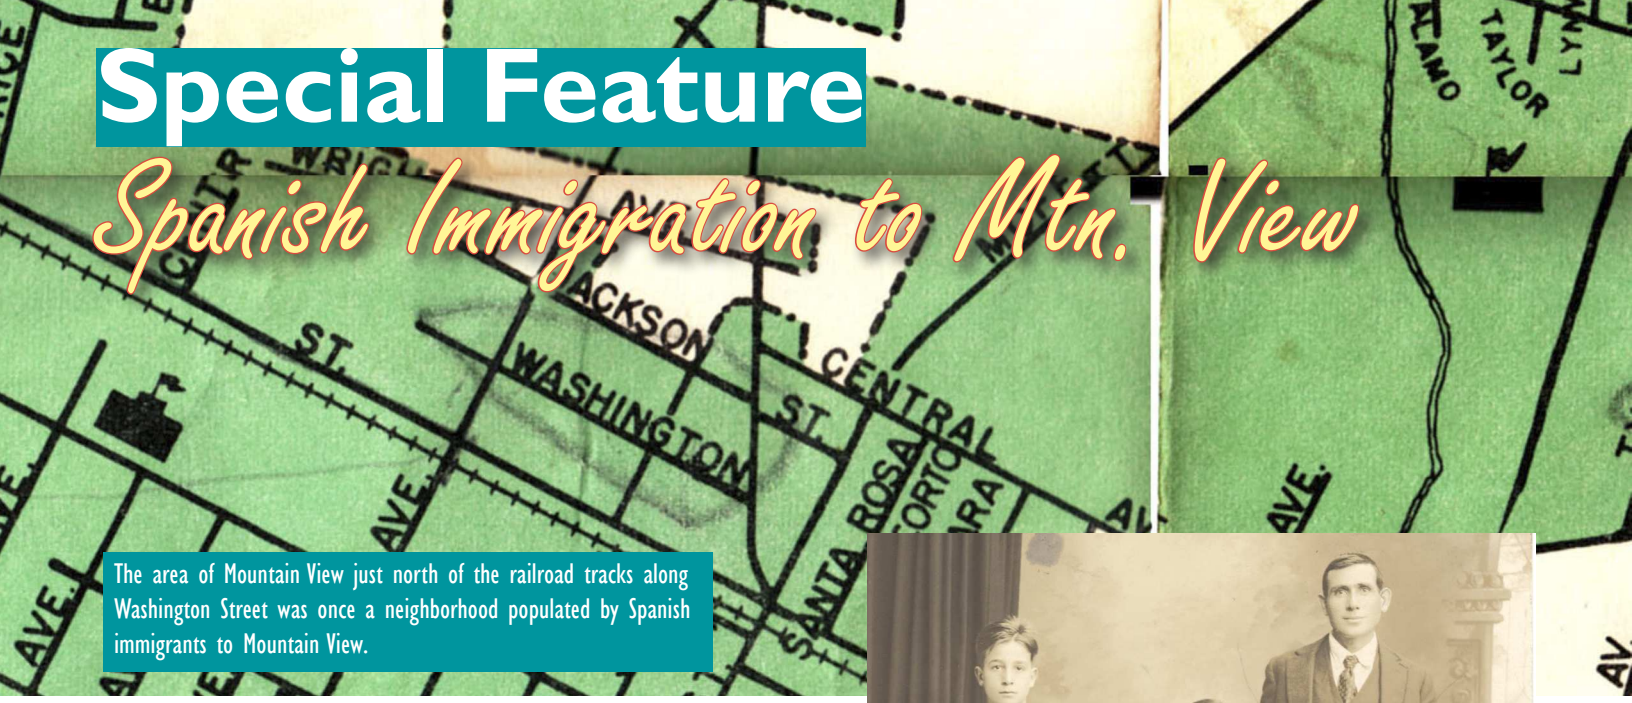

By the time this 1956 aerial photo was taken was taken, Santa Rosa Avenue, Santa Clara Avenue, Corto Street, and Miramonte Avenue (now Horizon Avenue) are lined with single family homes, as they are today.

Spanish Immigration to Mtn. View

The area of Mountain View just north of the railroad tracks along Washington Street was once a neighborhood populated by Spanish immigrants to Mountain View.

By David P. Salinero
MVHA Member

In the early 1900s, a community of Spaniards grew in the Washington Street neighborhood of Mountain View. These were not the descendants of conquistadores, but the result of Spanish emigration to the Americas due to economic distress in Europe. In the 350 years before 1850, the number who left Spain can be counted in the 100s of thousands. Between 1850 and 1930, it is estimated that about four million Spaniards left Spain for the Americas.

As a result of the 1898 Spanish-American war, Spain lost control of the Philippines and Cuba. Conditions in Spain were dire in the years following. Most of the Spaniards who left emigrated to Spanish-speaking countries. However, some arrived in the United States for various reasons. Some settled in Florida in order to work in the cigar industry which had moved from Cuba. Some worked in mines in the Eastern and Central U.S., and some made their way to California to work in agriculture. This diaspora was not unique to Spain. Citizens from countries like Italy, Portugal, and Yugoslavia also needed to leave their homes in search of work. Many of these emigrants also settled in Mountain View.

If you examine the 1930 U.S. Census, the areas around Washington Street of Mountain View had many residents who were born in Italy, Mexico, and Spain. In 1930, about 550 people lived in this neighborhood, and 70% had roots in Spain. Either they themselves or their parents were born in Spain. You'll find many Spanish surnames like Bautista, Hernandez, Herrero, Luis, and Sanchez.

But look closely and you'll find that many of the children were born in Hawaii. Why Hawaii? The Hawaiian Sugar Planter's Association actively recruited in Spain to bring contract workers from Spain to Hawaii. Between 1907 and 1913, there were six main voyages carrying about 9,000 Spaniards to Honolulu to work on plantations throughout the Hawaiian Islands. With the promise of a better life in exchange for work, these voyages were "free" to the Spanish families. Entire families (about half of the passengers were children) made the 50 day voyage. However, conditions were not as good as promised and some families left after only a few months or a few years on the islands.

The Bautista Family (c. 1926) L-R: Emiliano, Antonio, Paula, Juanita, Gabriel, Mariano. The Bautistas were one of many families to immigrate to Mountain View from Spain. They were first strawberry sharecroppers in Mayfield, CA (now south Palo Alto) and then settled in Mountain View's Spanish neighborhood, La Charca de La Rana ("The Frog Pond").

Most moved to Northern California to work in the fruit industry. Here they would find work picking prunes, cutting apricots, and canning fruit. Opportunities for laborers included the Vidovich farm at Calderon and Front (Evelyn) Street. This farm would hire workers to cut apricots and lay them on trays for drying. Trays would be the size of a kitchen table and workers would be paid a few cents per tray.

The "Pickle Works" plant at Franklin and Villa hired workers to cure pickles or process tomatoes. Work was also found at the Clark Cannery on Stierlin Road or the Bayside Cannery in Palo Alto. Some Spaniards also found work for the Southern Pacific Railroad.

Other Spaniards came to California by way of Ellis Island or Havana. Those who first got to California sent letters to family back in Spain telling them of their experiences and sponsoring them to come to California. A community grew up in the Washington Street neighborhood called "La Charca de La Rana" (The Frog Pond).

The name was a tongue-in-the-cheek reference to the muddy condition of the neighborhood's unpaved streets after a rainstorm. In her entry in the oral history of Mountain View's Spanish population Bittersweet: Memories of Old Mountain View, former resident of the neighborhood Maria Josepha Miras gives some additional insight into how the neighborhood got its name:

> It was nothing but mud. There were no streets, no lights, or anything. That is why they called Washington Street the "frog pond".
> Different people would have parties that lasted the whole night and they really had a ball. Isabel Nava used to have a party. They used to have a pool hall and they put everything away for the weekend. They had a big party for everybody. Then they would come home staggering in the middle of the night, not because they drank, but because they were tired.
> They were up to their knees in mud.

The number of Spaniards in the area grew large enough to support small businesses such as markets, service stations, billiard halls, barbers, and shoe repair. Spaniards opened their own businesses such as the Escano's Market, Guerrero's service station, and Galvan's barbershop. To help each other, the Spaniards also formed a branch of a social club based in Sunnyvale called Sociedad Cervantes Espanola. This started with funeral benefits, but like many Spanish clubs in the U.S. at the time, it raised money to support the Spanish Republic. At the conclusion of the Spanish Civil War (1936-1939), any hopes of returning to Spain were mostly dashed. These new Americans now had established roots in Mountain View. Most of their children were American citizens, and those who weren't applied in earnest to become naturalized citizens.

During the Great Depression other Spanish-speaking families, predominantly immigrants from Mexico and Mexican-American migrants from the Southwest, also settled in the Washington Street neighborhood. As was shared in our last newsletter, this Hispanic barrio was largely destroyed by the construction of Central Expressway and Shoreline Boulevard (then Bailey Avenue) in the 1960s and its residents forced to relocate.

Today, the descendants of the original Spanish immigrants in Mountain View have assimilated with the rest of the residents of the city. They might hold on to traditions by preparing Spanish recipes passed down from previous generations, but they no longer live together in one section of the city. Unless you know where to look, there are few indicators of the original "La Charca de la Rana". The original Spaniards forged a better life for their families. Their descendants have benefited from their hard work to realize the American Dream.

David P. Salinero is a third generation resident of Mountain View. Between 1913 and 1921, all his grandparents immigrated to California from the same small town located in the Salamanca region of Spain, named Macotera. His maternal grandparents arrived via Cuba, his paternal grandfather via Hawaii, and his paternal grandmother via Ellis Island.

Understanding the History of Housing in Mtn. View

Stories of Racism, Anti-Discrimination, & Movement Towards Inclusion

By IdaRose Sylvester
Membership Committee Chair

We are thrilled to announce our eagerly anticipated, long in the planning event, Understanding the History of Housing in Mountain View: Stories of Racism, Anti-Discrimination, and Movement towards Inclusion, is coming up on July 26, 6:30 p.m. to 8:30 p.m., at the Mountain View Community Center, 201 Rengstorff Ave. We are co-hosting this event with Mountain View's Human Relations Commission and Stanford University. Registration will be required, but we had to go to press before a link was available. Connect with me, IdaRose Sylvester, at idarose@siliconvalleylink.com if you wish to attend!

Mountain View has always been a diverse community, and one that strives to grow and learn, but over the years, discrimination has and continues to exist. This event specifically explores the history of racism in housing and will bring to light the history of exclusion in Mountain View. Part presentation, part interactive discussion among participants, this will be a lively, informative evening. You will see research about Mountain View's demographic and housing history, presented in an engaging, interactive format. We are thrilled to include stories from current and former community members spanning a 60+ year period of time, and you will hear directly from some of the people we interviewed, live, at the event. And there will be time for community discussion. Come prepared to learn, be moved, and be challenged to think of Mountain View, and its future, in new ways!

Editors Note: This is the same event announced in our previous newsletter as taking place on May 19. The date was changed after the previous newsletter went to press. Apologies for any confusion and hope to see you on July 26!

Looking Back: Photos from the Archive

In the spirit of our upcoming summer ice cream social, here's a photo showing the interior of the Silver Seal Creamery at 242 Castro Street around the time of its opening in 1933. A typed caption attached to the photo in our archives recounts the following humorous story:

"This was taken before the booths were installed. They had no safe place to put their money when they closed for the night, so they devised the system of putting the cash into a small paper bag like the ones they made up for candy grab bags. This sack was then placed among the bags of candy, for certainly no burglar would think of looking there. Whichever partner closed shop at night was not the one to open the following morning. One morning a small child bought a bag of candy on his way to school, before the store was properly opened. Guess which bag of goodies he got! They got most of the money back, the boy was so young he didn't know the value and they found him tossing coins into the air for his friends to scramble for."
